Edith's routine involved a customary stroll through the town square, where the air was therapeutic, and the bustling atmosphere provided a welcome distraction. However, the onset of bronchitis had disrupted this narrative, forcing her to seek solace in the quiet corners of her home.

One day, a nonchalant young man named Jake, a delegate from the local health committee, knocked on Edith's door. He carried an ointment known for its therapeutic properties, claiming it could alleviate the symptoms of bronchitis. Intrigued but somewhat defiant, Edith accepted the delegate's offer.
